Mother.

No earthly friend can fill a mother's place, When the dear one is with us here no more; No smiles so sweet, so loving to the core, As those which because upon that faithful face, Befletting every mesk, angelic grace; No words so kind, so potent to restore Joy to the soul, where sedness ruled before, As hers, who held us in her warm smbrace. But when the vesture visible to sight Has worn away, to set the spirit free, Then we belook those looks of love and light In fadelmo lines impressed on memory; To guard to here below, or guide the way to Heaven.

The Blacksmith.

Old England, she has great warriors, Great princes, and posts great; But the Blackenith is not to be quite forgot, In the history of the State.

Though he never doth break the law. Yet he laugheth and maketh more; And a share (concaded) in the poor man's field, Yet it adds to the poor man's store.

Then burrals for the Iron Blacksmith? And burnsh for his iron raw? And whomever we go where his forgot glow, We'll sing what a man can do.
